① Should City Children Experience Life in the Countryside?

② In recent years, more and more parents and teachers have asked: should city children go to the countryside to experience life? Some schools organize trips to villages so that students can see how farmers work, live with local families, and try activities like planting and feeding animals. This topic has caused a lot of discussion.

③ Those who support the idea believe that city children live in a very different world. They spend most of their time indoors, using computers and phones. Many of them have never seen where their food comes from. By going to the countryside, they can learn to appreciate (欣赏) nature, understand the hard work of farmers, and develop a sense of responsibility. They may also learn practical skills like cooking with fresh vegetables and taking care of animals. Supporters say these experiences can make children more independent and help them build good values.

④ Those who disagree argue that such trips can be expensive and not all families can afford them. Some parents worry about safety—what if children get hurt or feel uncomfortable in a new place? Besides, a short trip of a few days may not really change a child's habits. Critics (批评者) also point out that some "rural experience" programs are more like tourism than real learning. They suggest that schools could teach about farming and nature in the classroom instead, which would be cheaper and safer.

⑤ My view: I think city children can benefit from spending some time in the countryside, but it should be done properly. Schools and parents need to choose safe and meaningful programs. The focus should be on learning and growth, not just having fun. Whether through a school trip or a family visit, experiencing life beyond the city can open children's eyes and help them understand the world better.
