① Should Schools Extend the Lunch Break?

② In many middle schools in China, students have a lunch break of about 50 to 60 minutes. During this time, they eat lunch, rest, and maybe do some homework. In recent years, there has been a discussion: should schools make the lunch break longer? Some people say yes; others say no. Let us look at both sides.

③ Those who support a longer break argue that students need more time to rest. After a morning of classes, young people feel tired. A short break is not enough for them to digest (消化) their food properly or to relax their minds. Research shows that proper rest improves memory and helps students do better in afternoon classes. Supporters also point out that many students finish lunch quickly and then rush to do homework. They hardly have time to take a walk, talk with friends, or even close their eyes. A longer break would allow students to recharge (恢复精力) and return to class with more energy.

④ Those who disagree say that extending the break would shorten the school day or push classes later into the afternoon. Some parents worry that if students go home later, they will have less time for evening study or family activities. Besides, a longer break does not mean students will use the time wisely—they might just spend more time on phones or games. Critics also argue that 50 to 60 minutes is already enough if students use the time well. The problem might not be the length of the break, but how students choose to spend it.

⑤ In my opinion, the lunch break should be a bit longer—perhaps 70 to 80 minutes. Students today face a lot of pressure, and rest is important for both health and learning. Schools could try this in some classes first and see if it works. At the same time, students should learn to use their break time wisely: eat slowly, take a short rest, and avoid rushing through lunch to do homework. A good break helps us learn better.

注释： digest 消化；recharge 恢复精力
