08–13 第2篇

阅读理解（议论文）

① During holidays, should teachers give students reading tasks? This question has been discussed by parents and teachers for a long time. Some people support it, while others disagree. Let's look at both sides of the argument.

② Those who support holiday reading say it has many benefits. First, reading helps students keep their brains active during the long break. Without schoolwork, some students may spend too much time on phones or games. A reading list can guide them toward good books and useful knowledge. Second, reading improves language skills. The more students read, the better they become at understanding and writing. Third, reading during holidays can form a lifelong habit. When students grow up, they will already know that reading is a pleasant way to spend free time.

④ In my view, the key is balance. Reading during holidays can be helpful, but it should not feel like homework. Teachers could offer a list of suggested books instead of requiring everyone to read the same ones. Students could choose books that interest them. Also, the tasks could be light — for example, reading one or two books and sharing their thoughts in a relaxed way, such as a short talk or a drawing, rather than a long written report.

⑤ Whether we agree or not, we should remember that the goal of reading is to open minds and bring joy. If holiday reading does that, it is worth trying. If it only adds stress, we need to think again.
