Developing Empathy: Why It Matters and How to Grow It

Empathy is the ability to understand and share the feelings of others. It is what allows us to feel happy when a friend succeeds and sad when someone is hurt. In a world that often feels divided, empathy builds bridges between people. It strengthens friendships, reduces conflict, and makes our communities more caring. [1] Empathy is not fixed—it can be developed with intention and practice. Here is how to nurture this vital skill.

Start by listening with an open mind. [2] When someone shares their story or struggles, resist the urge to judge or give advice right away. Instead, try to see the situation from their point of view. Ask yourself: How would I feel if I were in their place? What might they need? Listening without interrupting and without planning your response shows that you value their experience. People feel understood when we truly hear them. This kind of attentive listening is the foundation of empathy.

Expose yourself to different perspectives. [3] We naturally understand people who are similar to us better. To grow empathy, seek out stories and experiences different from your own. Read books or watch films about people from other cultures, backgrounds, or life situations. Talk to people who have different opinions and try to understand why they think as they do. Travel, when possible, broadens our view of the world. The more we learn about others' lives, the easier it becomes to imagine walking in their shoes.

Practice kindness in small ways. [4] Empathy is not only about understanding—it is also about action. Holding the door for someone, offering a kind word to a classmate who seems upset, or helping a neighbor carry groceries are simple acts of empathy. Volunteering or helping others in need strengthens our ability to feel with others. When we act with kindness, we train our brains to notice and care about others' wellbeing. Small gestures can have a big impact on both the receiver and the giver.

Empathy makes us better people and creates a better world. [5] By listening deeply, seeking diverse perspectives, and acting with kindness, we can grow our capacity to understand and connect with others. Empathy does not mean agreeing with everyone—it means respecting their humanity. Start today: the next time someone shares something with you, pause, listen, and try to understand. Your relationships and your community will be stronger for it. In a world that needs more connection, empathy is a skill worth cultivating every day.
