Children's Rights: Every Child Matters

Children have the right to be safe, healthy, educated, and heard. This idea is at the heart of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, a treaty signed by almost every country in the world. The convention states that children should be protected from harm, have access to education and healthcare, and be able to express their views on matters that affect them. These rights apply to every child, regardless of where they live or who they are. [1]

Yet millions of children still face serious challenges. Some are forced to work instead of going to school. Others lack clean water, enough food, or a safe place to live. Conflict and disaster displace families, leaving children vulnerable. Bullying, both online and offline, harms many young people. Ensuring that every child can enjoy their rights requires action from governments, communities, families, and each of us. [2]

Schools play a key role. Education does more than teach reading and math—it helps children develop critical thinking, confidence, and the skills to protect themselves. Schools can also be places where children learn about their rights and how to stand up for them. When students feel safe and respected, they are more likely to speak up and participate. Teachers and parents can model respect and listen to children's opinions. [3]

Young people themselves are powerful advocates. Around the world, children and teenagers have led campaigns for climate action, against bullying, and for better education. When given the chance, they show that they can think deeply about issues and propose creative solutions. Supporting youth voice means creating spaces where children can share ideas and be taken seriously. [4]

Children's rights are not a luxury—they are the foundation for a fair and peaceful world. When we protect and empower the youngest among us, we build a better future for everyone. [5]
