Should Students Have Homework During Winter Holiday?

① Every winter, the same question comes up: should students have homework during the holiday? Some people say yes. Others say no. Both sides have their reasons, and it is worth thinking about carefully.
