Are Mobile Phones Good for Students?

① Mobile phones are everywhere. Today, even many primary school students have their own phones. Some people think phones are helpful for students, while others believe they do more harm than good. So, are mobile phones good or bad for students?

⑤ Perhaps the answer is not to ban phones completely, but to teach students how to use them wisely. Schools can set clear rules — for example, phones must be turned off during class. Parents can set time limits at home. Most importantly, students should learn self-control. A phone is just a tool. It depends on how you use it.
