My First Time Riding a Bike

① I still remember the summer afternoon when my dad brought home a shiny blue bicycle. It was a little tall for me, but he said I would grow into it soon. I touched the cold metal and imagined riding fast like the older kids in our neighborhood. That picture in my mind made my fingers tighten on the handlebars before I even started.

③ On the third afternoon, something changed. When I looked at the trees in the distance instead of the ground, the bicycle moved forward in a straighter line. Dad loosened his grip little by little until I realized he was walking beside me, not holding me up. A mix of fear and excitement filled my chest, as if the air itself had become lighter.

④ Then I fell. My knee hurt and my eyes watered, but Dad helped me stand and checked the bike first for scratches—then laughed softly and said, “Falling is part of learning.” I took a deep breath, wiped my face, and climbed back on because I did not want the fear to win.

⑤ That evening I rode two full circles without help. The wind touched my face, and pride rose inside me like warm water. That day I learned that courage is not having no fear at all, but choosing to move forward even when your knees shake and your path is still new.
