Paper Books or E-books?

① Reading is important for teenagers, but how we read is changing fast. Today, many students read on phones or tablets, while others still love paper books. In the library and at home, you can see both habits side by side. People often ask: which way is better for learning and for life?

② Paper books have clear strengths. They are easy on the eyes for long reading. You can turn pages, write notes in the margins, and feel the weight of a real book. Many teachers say paper books help students focus because there are no message alerts or games on the same screen. You also do not need to worry about a low battery when you study for exams.

④ However, the "best" choice is not the same for everyone. Some subjects need deep, slow reading—paper may win. For quick review or travel reading, e-books can be smarter. Your goal and your timetable should guide the choice. What matters most is not the tool, but the habit of reading every day and thinking about what you read.

⑤ In my view, we should welcome both forms. Use e-books when you need speed and convenience; use paper books when you want fewer distractions. The real question is not paper versus digital, but whether we keep reading with curiosity and care. Good readers learn to match the format to the moment, and that skill is useful for life.
