01–13 第1篇

阅读理解（记叙文） Shopping with Grandma Liu

① Grandma Liu lives next door to me. She is almost eighty years old and her legs are not strong, but she still likes to cook fresh food herself. Last Saturday morning, I saw her standing at the gate with an empty basket. "Lily," she said with a smile, "could you please come to the vegetable market with me?" I said yes at once.

② The market was busy and full of noise. Sellers were shouting about fresh fish and cheap apples. Grandma Liu held my arm tightly. We walked slowly from one stall to another. I helped her choose green vegetables, two tomatoes and a small bag of eggs. She told me how to tell whether eggs were fresh by holding them up to the light. I had never known that before.

③ At the fruit corner, a young seller gave us a wrong bill. He said the apples were 35 yuan, but my quick calculation showed it should be only 28. Grandma Liu was confused and ready to pay more. I politely pointed out the mistake. The seller checked again, thanked me, and gave us the right price. Grandma Liu patted my shoulder and said, "Math is really useful in daily life, isn't it?"

④ On our way home, Grandma Liu could not carry the heavy basket, so I took it for her. My arms became sore, but I felt proud. When we got back, she asked me to stay for lunch. She cooked egg-tomato noodles, and the smell filled her small kitchen. It was one of the best noodles I had ever tasted.

⑤ Before I left, Grandma Liu held my hand and thanked me again. I told her it was nothing — just a short walk to the market. But on my way upstairs, I realized that helping an old neighbor was more than shopping. It made two lonely mornings turn into one warm Saturday for both of us.
