阅读理解（议论文） Morning Exercise or More Sleep: Which Matters More?

① Many middle-school students face the same question every morning: should I get up early to exercise, or should I sleep a little longer? Some teachers love to tell students, "Early to bed and early to rise makes a person healthy and wise." However, some parents and doctors say that enough sleep is just as important for a growing body. The question is worth thinking about carefully.

③ On the other hand, people who prefer more sleep also make good points. Most middle-school students are between the ages of 12 and 15, and their bodies are changing quickly. Doctors say that teenagers need about nine hours of sleep each night. Students who go to bed late but get up very early may feel tired, sleepy and even a little sad during the day. A tired student cannot exercise well and cannot learn well either.

④ In my opinion, the answer is not "exercise or sleep," but "enough of both." Students should try to finish their homework earlier, turn off their phones before bed, and go to sleep by ten o'clock. Then they can get up around six forty, do ten to twenty minutes of light exercise, and still have enough sleep for their growing bodies. Health is a long race, not a short fight. Balance is the smartest plan.
