阅读理解（议论文） Is It Good for Students to Have a "Star" They Follow?

① Singers, sports players and movie actors often become the "stars" of young people. Many middle-school students post pictures of their favourite stars on their bedroom walls or their phone screens. Is following a star good or bad for students? Different people have very different answers.

④ I believe students can follow a star, but in a smart way. First, choose a star whose work really shows hard work and kindness. Second, learn from what the star does, not only what the star has. Third, keep your own life busy and colourful: study, read, exercise, spend time with family. A star should be a light at the window, not a sun that blocks our own sky. In this way, following a star becomes a way of growing up, not losing ourselves.
