01-22 第1篇

阅读理解（说明文） The Spring Festival: More Than a Long Holiday

① For Chinese people, the most important festival of the year is the Spring Festival, also known as Chinese New Year. It usually falls in late January or early February, when the first new moon of the lunar year rises in the sky. Unlike many other holidays, it is not just one day but a time of about two weeks full of colour, food and family.

② A few days before the festival, families begin "spring cleaning." Every room is swept, windows are wiped, and old newspapers are thrown away. The idea is simple: clean away the dust of the old year and welcome the new. On the doors, red paper strips with good wishes are put up. These are called "chunlian." Red is the colour of luck and happiness.

⑤ The festival ends on the fifteenth day with the Lantern Festival. People eat sweet rice balls, watch colourful lanterns, and read simple riddles written on them. Although life today is busy and fast, the Spring Festival still reminds us to slow down, come home, thank our family and send good wishes. Old customs can also be warm teachers for young hearts.
