阅读理解（记叙文） Fixing Dad's Old Bike

① Dad has ridden the same black bike to work for almost ten years. Last Saturday morning, he took it out of the shed, but the chain kept slipping off every time he turned the pedals. "This old friend needs a little care," he said with a smile. "Would you like to help me fix it?"

④ After about an hour, we put everything back together. Dad turned the pedals slowly. The chain moved smoothly, and the wheels spun like new. "Now you try it!" he said. I rode the bike along our small yard. It felt light and steady. More importantly, I felt a kind of pride that only fixing something with your own hands can give you.

⑤ Over lunch, Dad told me that when he was my age, his own father had also taught him to fix a simple bike. "Some small skills pass from one pair of hands to another," he said. I am going to remember this Saturday for a long time. A single black bike had become more than a way to go to work — it was a quiet lesson about learning from family.
