阅读理解（议论文） Should Parents Set Strict Time Limits for Video Games?

① Video games are part of many teenagers' daily life. Some students play for half an hour after homework, while others may play two or three hours on the weekend. Many parents wonder: should we give our children a strict time limit, or should we let them decide by themselves?

② Parents who prefer strict time limits say that video games are simply too attractive. The bright pictures and quick rewards can pull a student's attention for hours. Without a firm rule, a short "ten-minute break" can easily become a whole afternoon. Sitting too long is also bad for eyes and backs. For younger students who do not yet know how to stop, a clear time limit can protect both their health and their study time.

③ On the other side, some parents and students believe that strict rules may not be the best answer. Teenagers are at the age when they start to make their own choices. If every minute of their free time is controlled by parents, they may lose the chance to learn self-control. A few reasonable games can even bring friends together, help with English words, or teach team skills. Strict bans sometimes push students to hide their screens instead of playing less.

④ In my opinion, a family rule is needed, but it should be made together. Parents and children can sit down and agree on how many hours per week are fine, which days are game days, and what the student needs to finish first, such as homework and exercise. If the student keeps the rule well for a month, parents can allow a little more flexible time. In this way, rules are not just orders from parents, but shared promises that help teenagers grow up step by step.
