阅读理解（记叙文） A Busy Day at the Zoo

① Last weekend, I joined a student volunteer day at the city zoo. I had visited the zoo before, but that day was totally different — I was not a visitor any more, but a helper with a green cap and a small name tag.

② In the morning, a keeper named Uncle Li took five of us to the rabbit area. He taught us how to wash the water bowls and put fresh vegetables in the small feeders. Rabbits are shy, so we needed to move slowly and speak softly. One tiny white rabbit ran to my shoes and started to smell them. I wanted to touch it, but Uncle Li reminded me to wait until the rabbit came closer. "Trust needs time," he said with a smile.

④ Not every moment was easy. In a corner of the bird house, a teenage visitor was tapping loudly on the glass. I walked over and politely asked him to stop. "It may scare the birds and make them sick," I explained. At first, he looked a little annoyed, but then he nodded and said sorry. I realized that being a volunteer also meant being brave enough to speak up in a friendly way.

⑤ Before we left, Uncle Li gave each of us a small paper certificate and a photo with the rabbits. On the bus home, I looked out of the window and thought about the day. The zoo is not just a place to see animals; it is also a place to learn care, patience and quiet courage. I am going back next month, and I hope more classmates will join me.
