01-29 第1篇

阅读理解（记叙文） Grandma's Paper Scissors

① Every winter holiday, I go back to my grandma's village. Her small house is old, but the walls are always covered with red paper cuttings: dancing children, running horses, blooming flowers and fat fish. My friends in the city may think these pictures belong to a museum, but in Grandma's home, they are part of daily life.

② Grandma has been a paper-cutting artist for more than fifty years. When I was five, she tried to teach me, but I could not even hold a pair of scissors well. This year, I finally asked her to teach me again. She laughed and said, "A fourteen-year-old pair of hands can do much more than a five-year-old pair." Then she showed me how to fold the red paper and how to move the small scissors slowly.

③ My first cut looked like a broken umbrella. I felt disappointed. Grandma did not say "good" or "bad." She only pointed to the sunlight on the window and said, "The sun does not light up a tree in one second. It warms the tree little by little." I tried again and again. After six or seven attempts, a simple paper flower appeared in my hand. It was not perfect, but it was mine.

⑤ Before I went back to the city, Grandma gave me a special red envelope. Inside was not money, but a beautiful paper cutting: a girl holding a pen, with a small open book beside her. "For my student," she said. I now keep it on my desk. Every time I see it, I think of the warm winter afternoon, the smell of paper, and Grandma's slow, patient voice.
