阅读理解（议论文） Should Students Use Mobile Phones Between Classes?

① In more and more middle schools, teachers and parents are asking the same question: should students be allowed to use their mobile phones between classes? Some people say yes, but many others strongly disagree. This question is not as simple as it looks.

④ Second, phones reduce real communication between friends. During the ten-minute break, the healthiest choice is to walk around, drink some water, talk, and laugh with classmates. Eyes need to look at the far sky, and legs need to move. If everyone keeps their head down over a small screen, the playground becomes strangely quiet, and friendship becomes thinner and thinner.

⑥ A school is a place to learn, to grow, and to build real friendships. The ten minutes between classes is short, yet precious. Let us use it not for a screen, but for real people, real air and a real rest. That is the wiser choice.
