02-02 第1篇

阅读理解（记叙文） Clearing Snow for Old Mr. Li

① It snowed heavily on Friday night. When I opened the curtains on Saturday morning, the whole street was white. Roofs, trees and cars all wore a thick white coat. My little sister Amy cheered loudly and wanted to run out right away, but Mom stopped us at the door. "Before you play," she said kindly, "please go and clear the snow in front of old Mr. Li's gate. He lives alone and his leg still hurts."

② Mr. Li used to be a math teacher in our neighborhood school. After his wife passed away two years ago, his children moved to another city for work. Every spring, he shares red flowers from his small yard with the children on our lane. So Amy and I agreed at once. We put on thick gloves, took two small shovels, and walked through the quiet snow.

③ When we reached his gate, the snow was almost up to our knees. At first, we were full of energy. Amy pushed the snow aside and kept singing. I made a narrow path along the wall. After ten minutes, however, my back began to ache and my fingers felt cold inside the wet gloves. Amy said quietly, "It's harder than I thought." I smiled and told her, "Let's rest for a while, then go on."

④ Just as we sat on the stone step, the old wooden gate opened. Mr. Li came out slowly with a cup of hot ginger water in each hand. "My dear children," he said, his eyes shining. "I saw you from the window. You must warm yourselves first." His smile was gentle, like a warm candle in the cold wind.

⑤ After we finished, Mr. Li took out an old black-and-white photo. It showed him as a young man, standing with my grandpa in front of a small village school. "Your grandpa and I cleared snow together on such a morning almost forty years ago," he said, his voice trembling a little. "Kindness in our family never grows old."

⑥ Walking home, I held Amy's hand tightly. My shoulders still ached, but my heart felt surprisingly light. A small act of kindness, I suddenly understood, could connect two generations and warm a whole winter morning.
