阅读理解（议论文） Should Students Do Housework Every Day?

① In many Chinese families, housework is usually done by parents or even grandparents. Students are told, "Just study hard; don't worry about the dishes." But recently, a growing number of teachers are suggesting that middle school students should do some housework every single day. Is this really a good idea?

② Some parents disagree. They believe that learning is the only job of a student. In their eyes, twenty minutes spent on washing bowls could have been used to do three more math problems. They also worry that their children may break cups, burn their fingers, or simply do the work badly. "We can do it faster and better," one mother said. "Why should a tired child suffer again after a long day of school?"

④ More importantly, housework teaches lessons that books alone cannot teach. When a student cooks a bowl of noodles for a tired mother, he begins to understand what "family" means. When she cleans the floor with her father on Saturday morning, she learns that a warm home does not come from the sky, but from the hands of every member. Chinese people have a saying: "A child who never washes his own bowl will find it hard to build his own life."

⑥ Of course, housework must not become a new burden. Parents should match the work with the child's age, praise honest effort, and never use housework as a punishment. If both sides treat it as a daily family habit, doing housework will not take learning away; it will make learning deeper. A clean bowl, in the end, shapes a careful mind.
