阅读理解（议论文） Should Parents Read with Their Children Every Night?

① At the end of a long day, many parents sit down tired on the sofa and hand their middle school children a book. "Read on your own," they say. "You are not a baby anymore." Yet more and more teachers and reading experts are asking a gentle question: Should parents continue to read with their children every night, even in the teenage years?

② Some parents feel the answer is clearly "no." They believe that reading together belongs to early childhood. Once a child can read alone, parents should let him be independent. Besides, parents themselves are often busy. Between work, cooking and cleaning, spending another twenty minutes on a book feels like too much. "My son is fourteen," one father said, "He can read far more difficult books than I can."

③ However, these reasons only tell half of the story. Reading together does not mean reading the same words together; it means sharing the same book and the same thoughts. Even if the child reads silently and the parent listens, or the parent reads aloud a short news article at breakfast, the quiet moment builds a bridge between two minds that are often apart during the day.

⑥ Of course, parents should never use nightly reading as a second exam. Pushing, testing or writing long notes after each page will kill the joy quickly. The secret is simple: pick a book both sides like, read at the same time, close the book at the same time, and chat softly about only one or two things. Under the warm light of a table lamp, a family grows — not louder, not richer, but quietly wiser and closer.
