阅读理解（议论文） Are Online Lessons as Good as Classroom Lessons?

① In recent years, online lessons have become a normal part of school life. Students can sit at home in their pyjamas and join a math class by a few simple clicks. Some parents and students praise this new way of learning. Others, however, believe that a computer screen can never replace a real classroom. So which side has more reason to stand on?

⑥ Of course, online lessons do have their place. Short extra classes, make-up lessons for sick days, and live talks with foreign students are all bright gifts of the internet. Still, when we ask whether online can fully replace the classroom, the honest answer is "not yet." A good school is not only a building where knowledge is poured in — it is a living garden where minds, eyes and hands grow together.
