阅读理解（议论文） Should Middle School Students Take a Summer Part-time Job?

① When summer holiday arrives, some students travel, some attend weekend classes, and some stay home to read. In recent years, a new voice has joined the chorus: "Why not take a small part-time job?" Helping in a parent's shop, folding clothes in a bookstore, or being a junior volunteer at a summer camp — should middle school students really try these things, or is it better to stay away from work until they grow up?

② Those who are against the idea have serious worries. They say a middle school student is still young. The workplace can be tiring, and sometimes unsafe. If a child gets used to making money, study may become less interesting. One parent said, "My daughter is 14. Her job is to read Shakespeare, not to serve milk tea."

④ First, a small job teaches the real meaning of money. A student who earns 80 yuan in a hot afternoon learns to count his money more carefully than a student who only spends it. A bottle of bubble tea no longer seems so cheap. A new pair of sneakers may wait a little longer. These small changes in the mind help students become wiser customers for the rest of their lives.

⑥ Of course, a few fair rules are needed. The work must be light, must not be at night, and must never replace study. Parents should stay close by. Schools can offer a simple list of safe places, such as libraries, small museums or community helpers. Under these fair rules, two or three summer mornings behind a small counter may not earn much money, yet they can give a young person something far more valuable — the quiet pride of standing on his own feet for the first time.
