阅读理解（记叙文） The Day I Tried Rock Climbing

① Last Saturday our PE teacher, Mr. Chen, took ten of us to a new indoor climbing wall in our city. When I stood at the bottom and looked up, my heart started beating like a drum. The wall was about eight metres high, and the colourful holds looked so small from below. I am not afraid of most sports, but heights have always scared me a little.

② Mr. Chen smiled at us and said, "Today, nobody has to reach the top. Your only job is to be one step braver than yesterday." He asked Liu Yang, who already had some experience, to climb first. Liu Yang moved up the wall like a lizard, quick and light, and finished in two minutes. Everyone clapped. Then it was my turn. My hands were sweating before I even put on the safety belt.

④ I reached out to the blue hold and pulled myself up. Then I found another good hold for my foot. Step by step, I climbed higher. At about six metres, my arms felt as soft as noodles, but I could see a little red flag at the top. I told myself, "Just three more holds. Just three." And then I touched it.

⑤ When I came down, my legs were shaking, but I could not stop smiling. Mr. Chen gave me a small sticker that said "Braver than Yesterday". On the bus home, I looked out of the window and suddenly understood something: the wall had not grown shorter, and I was not suddenly stronger. What had changed was the voice inside my head. It used to say "I can't"; now it quietly said, "Let's try one more hold."
