阅读理解（议论文） Should Teens Share Their Photos on Social Media?

① Walk into any middle school classroom during the ten-minute break and you will see students holding phones, tapping screens and laughing at short videos or photos. Many of these pictures come from friends, but a growing number are posted by the students themselves. Selfies at the school gate, photos of test scores, a new haircut, or a group picture after PE class — they all go onto apps in one or two seconds. But should teenagers share so many of their photos online?

② Some people say "yes", and they have reasons. Posting photos helps students stay in touch with friends who live far away. It also encourages them to try new things: learning a dance, cooking a dish, or visiting a small museum becomes more interesting if they can show the photos later. A photo on a class group, they say, is just a modern way of saying "Look what I did today!"

⑤ In my view, teens should not stop using social media, but they should become smarter sharers. Before posting, a student can ask three quick questions: Is this really private? Would I be fine if my teacher saw it? Am I doing it only to get "likes"? If any answer feels uncomfortable, it is better to keep the photo for family and close friends only. A clever sharer keeps both the fun and the safety of growing up.
