阅读理解（记叙文） The Injured Kite in Our Courtyard

① It was a windy Sunday afternoon last March. My little sister Mimi and I were flying our new blue kite in the courtyard of our building. The wind was strong, and our kite danced up into the grey sky like a small happy fish. Suddenly, we heard a sharp cry, and something heavy dropped near the flower bed. It was not our kite. It was a real bird — a small hawk with black-and-white feathers.

④ When the bird was safe inside the box, Grandpa Zhao called the city wildlife rescue centre. A lady named Ms. Lin answered. She said, "Please do not give the bird water or food. Just keep it in a dark, quiet place. We will arrive in twenty minutes." While we waited, Mimi kept whispering to the box, "Please don't be afraid. The doctor is coming."

⑥ That night, Mimi drew a picture of the kite and the bird together and put it on the fridge. I looked at it for a long time. The wind had blown our plastic kite down from the sky, but it had also brought a small lesson into our home: kindness is not enough by itself; kindness with the right knowledge is what really helps.
