阅读理解（议论文） Should Parents Check Their Children's Phones?

① Every night in many Chinese homes, the same small war quietly starts: the child is lying in bed with a phone, and the parent walks to the door and says, "Give me your phone. I want to have a look." Some children hand it over; others hide it under the pillow. A question is now heating up on parent forums: is it right for parents to check their children's phones?

④ A second problem is trust. If a mother often opens her daughter's phone, the daughter may learn a clear lesson: the only safe way is to hide. She might create a second chat account, or delete messages every evening. In the end, the phone may look "clean", but the real conversation has simply moved to a place where parents cannot see it at all. Checking, in this case, does not protect — it pushes communication into the dark.

⑥ A phone is only a small glass rectangle, but the trust between parents and children is long and warm. A wise family uses the phone to grow trust, not to break it. When we talk about our online life openly, we find that most of our worries are much smaller than we thought.
