阅读理解（议论文） Should Middle-School Students Wear Makeup to School?

① Walk out of any popular short-video app in the evening, and you will see many teen faces with careful eyeliner, bright lip colour and "glass skin". Some girls — and a growing number of boys — are bringing this look to the classroom. In a recent school survey of 800 Grade 7–9 students, almost one in five said they sometimes put on light makeup before school. This has started a warm debate: should middle-school students wear makeup to school?

⑤ There is also a fairness question. If makeup becomes normal in the classroom, students who choose not to wear any may feel left out, as if they have lost a quiet competition. Teachers have noticed that such "beauty pressure" can quietly hurt friendships and even grades, especially for girls who are already shy.

⑥ In my view, schools should not ban every drop of beauty product — sunscreen, lip balm and clean hair are all welcome. But heavy eye makeup, long fake lashes and bright blush are better kept for weekends or special family dinners. School is a place to train the mind and the heart, not the face. When we are young, a clean smile is already the best "filter" we will ever wear.
