阅读理解（记叙文） My First Camping Night With Dad

① Last summer, Dad suddenly said at dinner, "Liang, next weekend, you and I will camp on Green Valley Hill — just the two of us." My spoon stopped in mid-air. I had never slept in a tent in my life. The idea was half exciting and half scary. Mum just smiled and said, "Take a thick jacket. Mountains are cool at night."

② We got to the hill at four in the afternoon. Dad taught me how to pitch the tent. I thought it would be easy — just push up a stick and throw a cloth over it. I was wrong. The poles kept slipping, the door kept facing the wrong way, and once the whole tent fell on my head like a green jellyfish. Dad laughed so hard that his glasses slid down. After forty minutes of sweating, we finally made a small blue home standing by a pine tree.

③ At sunset, we cooked noodles on a tiny gas stove. The smoke got in my eyes, my fingers got oil on them, and the noodles were too hot to swallow. Yet that simple bowl tasted better than any fancy dinner in town. While we ate, Dad pointed at the sky and said, "Look, the first star." I looked up — and then I saw them, one, two, and soon hundreds, brighter than anything I had seen in the city.

④ Trouble came at night. Around ten o'clock, the wind grew strong and the tent began to shake. Somewhere in the bushes, a small animal made a strange, short cry. My heart jumped. I moved closer to Dad and whispered, "Is it a wolf?" Dad smiled in the dim light and said quietly, "It's only a small deer calling its mother. Listen carefully — it is not angry, just a bit lost." I listened again. He was right. The cry sounded almost like a question.

⑤ I could not sleep for a long time. I kept thinking of Mum at home, of the warm bed in my room, of my Monday English test. Then Dad gently said, "Fear is not a bad thing, Liang. It just means you are growing into a new place. Breathe out slowly, listen to the wind, and feel the ground under your back." I did what he told me. Little by little, the tent stopped feeling strange. It became a small soft boat floating on the hill.

⑥ When I woke up at six, the whole valley was silver with dew. A bird sang somewhere above the pine tree. I opened the tent door and saw Dad already making tea. He handed me a warm cup and said, "You did well, my boy." I did not say much, but I knew something inside me had quietly changed. Home was still the safest place, but the world outside my door was a little less scary than before.
