阅读理解（议论文） Should Our School Have a "No-Phone Day" Once a Month?

① Last term, the students' union of Bright Future Middle School put a new idea on the wall: "Let us try a No-Phone Day on the last Friday of every month — from 7 a.m. to 9 p.m., no one, not even teachers, uses a mobile phone inside the school gate." Since then, the idea has been talked about in every classroom, at lunch tables, and even on the parents' chat group.

④ Is there a way in the middle? I believe there is. The school can keep the No-Phone Day, but allow one "family-call window" from 12:10 to 12:30, when students may use the office phone or a school tablet to contact their parents. Teachers can also prepare rich offline activities that day — Go chess, Rubik's cube, handwriting, dance, chorus, or a school yard run. Phones then lose their charm not because they are banned, but because something else is already more interesting.

⑤ A phone is a clever tool, but a clever student should be its master, not its servant. One quiet day each month will not damage our studies; it may, instead, help us rediscover the busy, colourful, wonderful real world right beside our desks.
