阅读理解（记叙文） A Surprise Dinner for Mum's Birthday

① Mum's birthday always falls on a Thursday this year. Dad had a business trip to Xi'an, and my little brother, Dabao, was only seven. I was in Grade 8 — old enough, I thought, to do something real. Two weeks before, I whispered my plan to Dabao: "Let's cook a small dinner by ourselves, and buy her nothing from the shop. Just a home-made Happy Birthday." His eyes became as round as two coins.

⑤ Mum came home at 18:30. When she pushed open the door, she saw the small cake in the middle of the table, two candles dancing, a child-made card saying "Happy Birthday, Our Hero". For a second, she did not say anything. Then she set down her bag and her office folder, walked to me, and held my hand, which still smelled like soap and tomato juice. "You made all this?" she asked quietly. Dabao jumped in front of her, "The dumplings are mine! I folded them! Twenty-four!"

⑥ That night, the three of us sang softly in the small living room. The eggs were a little salty, the cucumber salad too sour, and the cake almost fell when Dabao blew the candles too hard. But Mum said it was the best birthday dinner she had ever had. Before she slept, she sent me a short message: "Today I saw that my son has quietly grown up. Thank you for the dinner, and for making my heart warm." I read it under my blanket twice, and then three times, before I could finally close my eyes.
