阅读理解（议论文） Should Teenagers Be Allowed to Travel Alone?

① Every summer, a lively discussion returns to Chinese families: should a 13- or 14-year-old be allowed to travel alone — by train, by long-distance bus, or even by plane? Some parents proudly let their child buy a ticket and visit a cousin in another city. Other parents lock their door and say, "Not until university." As more middle school students ask for this kind of freedom, the old question becomes loud again.

③ Another reason supporters give is trust. Teens who feel trusted by their parents often act more responsibly. A 14-year-old who is told, "I believe you can do this," may take the trip more seriously than one who is watched all the time. Some experts say we cannot train a young person to be careful by locking him inside a safe box. Careful adults are grown from brave little trips, not from silent rooms.

⑥ My own view is that the answer depends on three factors: the child's age and character, the difficulty of the trip, and the preparation before it starts. A careful, mature 15-year-old, travelling a direct high-speed train to an uncle's house in a city he knows, with a working phone and money for three days, is probably safe. A nervous 12-year-old, changing three buses to a strange town with no clear plan, is probably not.

⑦ In the end, letting a teen travel alone is not a one-word "yes" or "no". It is a careful yes, with training, rules, and a ready hand on the phone. Parents should not be walls; they should be coaches. Life, after all, will one day send our children out into the world — and it is better for them to take their first small trips while our love is still close enough to catch them.
