阅读理解（议论文） Should Children Be Paid for Housework?

① In many Chinese homes, this spring, a small but warm argument is happening at the dinner table: should children be paid for doing housework? Some parents believe that offering a little money for washing dishes, sweeping the floor, or walking the dog is a fair and useful deal. Others worry that money inside the family may push out something more important — love. Let us take a careful look at both sides.

② People who support paying say it is a good way to teach money sense. A 13-year-old who has earned 20 yuan by cleaning the kitchen for five evenings may think twice before spending it on bubble tea. He may also learn simple ideas like "budget", "saving", and "fair wage". In a world full of online shopping and quick payments, such lessons are, in fact, very hard for schools alone to teach.

⑥ My own view tries to take a middle path. Basic chores — making one's own bed, putting away one's clothes, washing one's own bowl — should simply be part of being a family member, with no payment at all. But extra, heavy, or skilled tasks — such as cleaning the whole kitchen, washing the car, or helping Grandma with a two-hour shopping trip — can be connected with small rewards, like pocket money, book coupons, or family cinema tickets. The key is that the list is written together, and reviewed every season.

⑦ In this way, children learn two things at once: love does not need money, and work does deserve thanks. A healthy family is not a silent factory, nor a cold market. It is a place where dishes are washed together, and where, sometimes, a small reward is a whispered way of saying, "I see you. Thank you."
