04-28 第1篇

阅读理解（议论文） Is It a Good Idea for Teenagers to Watch Short Videos Every Day?

① Every morning, at our school gate, you can see small screens glowing in students' hands. A quick 15-second dance, a 30-second funny cat, a one-minute street food clip — and the bell rings. In China, teenagers now spend on average more than 90 minutes a day watching short videos. Some call them "vitamin tablets for the mind": small, sweet, easy to take. But many teachers and parents ask a harder question: is watching short videos every day really a good thing for middle school students?

② People who support short videos list some real benefits. A 90-second clip about the Three Gorges Dam can teach a student things a textbook cannot, with music, drones, and colour. Videos made by kind strangers can introduce a shy student to the wider world: Japanese train stations, African farms, Russian winter markets. A well-made short video is like a window. Compared with long TV programmes, short videos are also free, easy to pause, and safe to watch for a few minutes between classes.

③ Opponents, however, point to a growing pile of problems. Short videos are designed to be easy. Each clip is just long enough to give a quick feeling — a laugh, a surprise, a small bit of news — and just short enough to leave you wanting another. Without noticing, a student may start with "two videos" and look up an hour later. Sleep is cut. Homework is rushed. Eyes become tired. Over time, the brain may find thick books harder to read because it has learned to expect a new surprise every 30 seconds.

④ Another worry is content quality. Not every clip is a window; some are walls. Teens can easily meet videos that teach wrong grammar, show dangerous stunts, or sell fake products. Unlike a school library, no librarian checks every short video. The "trending" page often shows what is exciting, not what is true. If students do not learn how to read short videos carefully, they may take home pocketfuls of half-truths instead of knowledge.

⑤ In my view, the answer is not "ban everything", but "manage it wisely". Short videos can be friends of learning — if the total time is limited (say, 30—45 minutes a day), and if the topics are mixed: news, science, sports, music, and English learning. Watching together with parents can also help — parents can ask simple questions like "Do you believe this?" and "Why did the maker post it?" This small habit turns passive watching into quiet training in critical thinking.

⑥ Schools, on their side, can teach a new kind of lesson: "Reading short videos", like reading books. They can show students how to check sources, how to find the original news, and how to tell a clever trick from a real fact. Short videos, like salt, can make life tasty or make a dish unfit to eat. It depends on how much we use, and how carefully. The middle school brain is young and fast; it deserves better than endless sugar, and it is strong enough to learn to choose.

根据文章内容，选择最佳答案。

1. What main question does the article discuss?

A. How to film a short video well.
B. Is watching short videos every day good for middle school students?
C. How to buy a smartphone cheaply.
D. Why teachers should retire early.

2. According to paragraph ②, short videos can:

A. Teach only mathematics.
B. Introduce students to the wider world and support some learning.
C. Be used only for cooking.
D. Replace all paper books.

3. What problem is raised in paragraph ③?

A. Short videos are made only for adults.
B. Watching too many short videos can cut sleep, hurt eyes, and make long books harder to read.
C. Short videos cannot be paused.
D. Short videos are very expensive.

4. What is the writer's main worry about content in paragraph ④?

A. Many short videos show only old classical music.
B. Videos are too silent.
C. Not every clip is checked, so they may spread wrong grammar, dangerous stunts, or half-truths.
D. Every short video teaches good history.

5. What does the writer FINALLY suggest?

A. Schools should ban all short videos.
B. Students should watch videos all day.
C. Limit daily time, mix topics, watch with parents, and learn to "read" short videos critically.
D. Only adults should watch short videos.

答案与解析

1.
【答案】B
【题型】主旨大意题
【定位】第①段末问题
【解析】讨论刷短视频对初中生是否有益。故选 B。

2.
【答案】B
【题型】细节理解题
【定位】第②段
【解析】短视频可开阔视野。故选 B。

3.
【答案】B
【题型】细节理解题
【定位】第③段 "Sleep is cut... eyes tired... thick books harder"
【解析】睡眠、视力、专注均受影响。故选 B。

4.
【答案】C
【题型】细节理解题
【定位】第④段
【解析】内容未经审查，良莠不齐。故选 C。

5.
【答案】C
【题型】主旨归纳题
【定位】第⑤—⑥段
【解析】限时+混题材+共同观看+批判思维。故选 C。

词汇注释（超纲词）

- trending [adj.] 热门的
- critical [adj.] 有判断力的
- stunt [n.] 特技动作