阅读理解（记叙文） The Thunder Night and My Little Brother

① My little brother Tiantian is eight years old, three years younger than me. He is brave in the daytime. He can pick up a caterpillar with his bare hands and race the fastest boys on the playground. But at night, when thunder rolls over our flat, he turns back into a small, frightened child who wants the lamp on.

② Last Friday, a big storm came to our city. At first, there was only a soft wind. Then the sky turned dark green, and fat raindrops began to hit the windows like little stones. Tiantian and I were watching an animal programme in the living room when the lights blinked once, twice, and went out. The whole flat fell into black. A long, deep roar of thunder shook the walls.

③ Tiantian screamed. I felt his small hand grab my arm so tightly that his nails almost hurt. My first thought was, "I am scared too." But I was the older brother, and I remembered something my mother once told me: "Fear becomes smaller when you give someone a job." So I took a slow breath and said, "Tiantian, I need your help."

④ I took out my phone torch and gave him the smaller flashlight from my desk. "Your job," I said, "is to check the windows. Make sure they are all closed tight so the rain does not come in. I will check the candles." His crying stopped at once. He marched around the flat with his little flashlight, saying "Check!" at every window, like a brave soldier. I followed behind and lit two small candles on the kitchen table.

⑤ After ten minutes, we sat under a blanket together on the sofa. The thunder still rolled, but it sounded farther away now. I told Tiantian that thunder is only the sound that lightning makes when it heats the air very fast. "It is very loud," I said, "but the sound cannot hurt you. The rain is washing the streets." He nodded slowly, and then asked, "Do clouds also get scared?" I laughed and said, "No, they just cry a little. Then they feel better." He smiled, and for the first time that evening, he looked calm.

⑥ The lights came back at nine o'clock. Mother rushed home from her meeting, worried about both of us. But when she opened the door, she found a quiet living room with two small candles, two empty cups of milk, and two brothers sharing one blanket. Tiantian told her proudly, "I checked every window, Mama!" That night, I fell asleep thinking that sometimes the best way to be brave is simply to stand beside someone smaller, and give fear a useful job.
