阅读理解（议论文） Should Middle Schools Start Classes Later in the Morning?

① In many Chinese cities, the first class in a middle school begins at 07:30 or even 07:20. Students wake up at 06:10, wash quickly, push a cold bun into their mouths on the bus, and arrive at the classroom with sleepy eyes. In recent years, more and more doctors and parents have been asking: should middle schools let classes start later, say at 08:15 or 08:30? I believe they should.

⑤ Some teachers worry that if school starts later, it will also end later, and students will have less time for homework, sports or family. This is a fair concern. However, research from several Beijing and Shanghai pilot schools shows a surprising result: when the first class is moved from 07:30 to 08:15 and the last class is pushed only 20 minutes later (the rest of the time is saved by shortening the morning break), students finish homework faster in the evening because they concentrate better. Thus the total "free" time is almost the same.

⑥ A small change of 45 minutes in the morning can be a large gift for a young life. More sleep, safer streets, better breakfasts, clearer minds — all without new buildings or expensive equipment. I hope more schools will try this simple change, and I hope one day, waking up at 06:10 will be only a story that today's middle school students tell their grandchildren.
