阅读理解（议论文） Should Middle School Students Do at Least One Hour of Housework Every Week?

① In my school's new parent-teacher meeting, one small question caused a long and lively discussion: should middle school students spend at least one hour a week on housework — washing dishes, sweeping floors, folding clothes or preparing simple meals? Some parents said "yes"; others said "no, my child is too busy." I believe the answer should be a clear "yes".

② First, housework is a kind of body exercise. An hour of sweeping a floor, wiping tables and washing bowls is equal to a gentle walk in the park. Our hearts beat a little faster, our arms move in different directions, and our eyes look away from screens. For a middle school student who already sits for eight hours at a desk, this kind of moving is quietly healthy.

⑥ Housework is not about saving parents a little work. It is about helping children grow into kind, responsible adults who know how to run their own small homes one day. I therefore hope that every middle school will quietly encourage its students — and that every parent will resist the temptation to do "everything for the child". One broom in a teenager's hand does more teaching than many chapters of a textbook.

根据短文内容，选择最佳答案。

1. What is the main opinion of the writer?

A. Middle school students should not do any housework.
B. Middle school students should do at least one hour of housework every week.
C. Housework is only for adults.
D. Parents should do all housework alone.

2. How, according to paragraph ②, is housework similar to a gentle walk in the park?

A. Both are done outside.
B. Both make the heart beat a little faster, move the arms and give the eyes a break from screens.
C. Both are free of all physical effort.
D. Both must be done with music.

3. Why does the writer say housework teaches us about "effort and result"?

A. Because housework results come much later than exam results.
B. Because the result — a shiny plate, a flat bed, a clean floor — appears right after the work is done.
C. Because housework is always easy.
D. Because housework is always painful.

4. How does housework change a teenager's sense of family, according to paragraph ④?

A. It makes teenagers angry with their mothers.
B. It helps teenagers see the invisible labour that has been supporting the family for years, and makes their "thank you" more meaningful.
C. It stops teenagers from talking to their mothers.
D. It causes family members to move out.

5. How does the writer answer parents who worry about "stealing study time"?

A. One hour a week is less than 15 minutes a day, and short physical pauses can raise later concentration.
B. Studies are not important at all.
C. Children should study 24 hours a day.
D. Parents should hire other people to help their children study.
