阅读理解（议论文） Should Middle School Students Be Allowed to Wear Earphones on the Way to School?

In my city, more and more middle school students wear earphones while walking or cycling to school. Some parents like the idea, because their children are quieter in the morning. Others are worried. Should we really allow middle school students to wear earphones on the street? I do not think we should — at least not on both ears.

First, traffic safety is the most serious problem. A student with earphones often cannot hear a car horn, a bicycle bell or a shout from a friend. Experts in our city's traffic department say that pedestrians wearing earphones are much more likely to be hit by electric bikes at crossings. Their eyes may look ahead, but their ears are "switched off". In a busy city street, this is dangerous, especially on rainy mornings when drivers cannot see clearly.

Second, loud music over a long time is bad for our hearing. Many young people turn up the volume to block out street noise. Doctors warn that listening to loud sounds above 85 decibels for more than one hour a day can damage the small hair cells inside the ear, and the damage is usually permanent. Every year, more and more teenagers go to hospital because they cannot hear high sounds clearly. Their parents are always surprised, but the real reason is often those tiny earphones they have been wearing since Grade 5.

Of course, some students will say, "Music helps me relax before a hard school day." That is true. Music can make a long walk feel shorter. But there are safer choices. Students can listen at home before leaving, keep only one ear open on the way, or use a small speaker at a low volume. In this way they still enjoy music, but they do not give up their safety.

In short, earphones are not evil, but full-ear listening while walking in traffic is. Schools should teach students the "one ear open" habit, and parents should set clear volume limits at home. A happy morning song is nice, but it is never as important as a safe arrival at school.
