阅读理解（记叙文） The Old Bicycle and the New Route

① My grandfather's old bicycle had been standing quietly in the corner of our garage for almost ten years. Its silver paint had turned grey, the seat was cracked, and one of the bells was missing. Every time I walked past it, I felt a little sorry — it seemed to be waiting for something. Last summer, I finally decided to wake it up.

② It all started on a hot Monday in July. The bus I usually took to Grandma's village had stopped running because the road was being repaired. Mum said, "You can wait until August, or you can find another way." I was already bored after only three days of holiday, so I chose the second answer. That night I found the old bicycle, cleaned the dust off it, and pumped the tyres. The next morning, with a simple map and a water bottle in my bag, I pushed it out of the garage.

③ The first kilometre was easy. The sun was still soft, and the road was flat. I even started to sing. But soon the road turned into a narrow path between rice fields, and then into a long, slow hill. My legs began to burn, and sweat ran into my eyes. I got off the bike and walked, feeling a little silly. An old farmer who was cutting grass saw me and smiled. "Not that way, young man," he said kindly. "If you go left at the big tree, the hill ends after five minutes." I thanked him and turned left.

⑤ I reached Grandma's village around noon — two hours later than usual, but with a face full of sunshine. Grandma opened the door, saw my red cheeks, and laughed. "You rode that old thing all the way here?" she asked. I nodded proudly. At lunch, she told me the bicycle had once belonged to Grandpa, who rode it to work every day for thirty years. "He used to say," she added softly, "that the long road teaches you things a short road cannot."

⑥ Now I understand what Grandpa meant. The road had taken me longer, but it had given me a kind farmer, a hidden bridge, a field of sunflowers, and a quiet pride I had never felt on a bus. Sometimes the old thing in the corner of the garage is not waiting to be thrown away. It is waiting to take you somewhere new.
