阅读理解（议论文） Should Middle Schools Still Ask All Students to Learn Classical Poems by Heart?

① Every middle-school student in our country knows the feeling: your Chinese teacher stands at the door of the classroom, a list in her hand, and you have 20 seconds to recite a Tang poem in front of her before you may enter. Some students love it; others quietly hate it. In a recent school survey, nearly half of the Grade 8 students said: "Why should we learn so many old poems by heart? In 2027, we have AI; it can give us the meaning in one second." So, should middle schools still ask every student to learn classical poems by heart? I believe the answer is yes — though the way we teach them must be thoughtful.

② Those who disagree have understandable reasons. First, they say learning old poems takes up a lot of evening time that could be used for Maths, English or sleep. Second, old Chinese characters and grammar are hard; many students memorise sounds but do not really understand the poem. Third, they argue that the ideas of old poems belong to the lives of farmers and officials a thousand years ago, and may not speak to a city teenager's life today.

③ These points are fair, but I do not think they close the case.

④ First, learning a poem by heart is not just about memory — it is about the sound of the language. Classical Chinese poems were made to be said aloud. They have a clear rhythm, beautiful repeats, and short but powerful lines. When we recite them — "床前明月光" — the sound of the words enters our body. Over time, this slowly teaches us how to hear Chinese at a higher level, just as learning songs teaches us to hear music. A student who can recite twenty poems writes better in his own words too.

⑥ Third, the worry that "old poems are too far from modern life" is partly a misunderstanding. Yes, farmers and officials are not our daily world. But the real subjects of Tang and Song poems — missing a friend, the moon over a home village, a rainy day by a window, the quiet sadness of getting older — are still the deepest things in human life. A middle-school student today feels all of these, too. The language is old; the heart is not.

⑦ There is also a wider reason. Classical poems are a common language in Chinese culture. When we meet a stranger who has read the same poems, there is an invisible "hello" between us, even if we say nothing. At the Chinese New Year table, a grandmother who remembers 《元日》 can look at her grand-daughter and smile; the girl can smile back and finish the next line. That shared memory is a quiet treasure that no short video can replace.

⑨ So, should every middle-school student still learn classical poems by heart? Yes, but with patience, with real feeling, and with room to grow. A hundred good poems carried quietly in the mind is one of the most beautiful gifts a school can give a young person — a small private library that no phone can take away.
