阅读理解（记叙文） The Old Bicycle I Almost Sold

① The bicycle had been leaning against our balcony wall since I was in Grade 5. It was an ordinary dark-green bike with a slightly rusty chain, two worn-out handle grips, and a small silver bell that still said "ding" in a clear, thin voice. My father had bought it second-hand the summer I learnt to ride. For almost two years it went with me everywhere — to the street market, to the small lake behind the school, to the noodle shop on Saturdays. Then, in Grade 7, a new electric bike came into our home, and the old green bicycle slowly became a quiet shadow on the balcony.

③ At lunchtime, Dad came out onto the balcony holding two apples. He stopped when he saw me wiping the dust off the bike. "You are selling it?" he asked, in that careful voice he uses when he is trying to not say too much. I nodded. "It just sits here. Nobody uses it." He stood there for a moment, looked at the old green frame, and quietly put the apples on the small table. "Clean it well, then," he said. "Give it one last clean."

⑥ "I wrote those entries with you," Dad said softly. "You dictated, I wrote. You were too small to hold a pen and the spanner at the same time." He turned the spanner in his hand. "This is the one we used to fix the back brake every month. It still fits." Then he said something I had not expected: "You can still sell the bike. It is yours. I only wanted you to know — this bike is not just metal."

⑧ I opened the app and wrote a short message to the buyer. "I am very sorry. I have changed my mind. Please choose another bike. Thank you for your time." I pressed send before my courage could run away. Then I walked down to the storeroom, found a larger cover, and gently pulled it over the old green bike. I did not throw it away. I did not sell it. I did not even ride it — not yet.

⑨ That evening, Dad did not say a single word about the bike. He only asked me to pass the soy sauce at dinner. But as we ate, I noticed his eyes moving to the balcony door every now and then, very quickly, as if checking that the green shadow was still there. And it was. It is. Some things, I have learnt, cost almost nothing and are worth more than any money can buy.
