阅读理解（议论文） Should Parents Be Allowed to Read Their Children's Diaries?

① Last month, a Grade 8 girl in a nearby school found her mother sitting on her bed, holding her diary open. The girl cried. Her mother said, "I am your mother. I have the right to know." The girl said, "But this is my heart. It is not a report card." Within two days, the video of their argument went around the city. The question came back to many dinner tables across the country: should parents be allowed to read their children's diaries? I think the fair answer is no, not without serious reason and not without asking, and below is why.

② First, a diary is not simply a notebook. It is a private, honest place where a young person tries to understand himself or herself. Teenagers write down strong feelings — about their dreams, fears, anger, even small crushes — precisely because no one is watching. If a diary is secretly read, the owner no longer trusts the page. The writing becomes polite and empty, a performance for unseen eyes. A diary that everyone can read is no longer a diary; it is a school composition.

④ Third, it is a question of trust, and trust is a two-way street. Many parents, when asked why they opened a diary, say: "I was worried; I had to know." This is true love, and I do not question the worry. But if we teach children that being loved means being watched, we teach them that love is a form of control. Trust, on the other hand, says: "I believe you, and I will ask you when I want to know." Children who grow up trusted are more likely, not less, to talk openly with their parents in hard times.

⑤ Of course, the other side has real points too. Parents have a duty of care. If a teenager shows signs of serious sadness, of being bullied, or of doing something dangerous, a parent cannot simply shrug and say, "That is her diary." In such cases, the worry is bigger than privacy. I would agree that, under clear signs of danger, a parent may read the diary — after first telling the child and, if possible, with the child present.

⑥ Some might reply: "If I tell her first, she will hide the diary." Perhaps, at first. But this is the very point: the goal of a parent is not to catch the child by surprise, but to open a conversation. Hiding a diary more carefully is only a new problem; the old problem — the reason for sadness or danger — will still be there. Real safety comes from talking, not from spying.

⑦ There is also a practical argument. Parents who often read diaries secretly are often the parents who complain most loudly that their children "tell them nothing". This is not a coincidence. The child feels secretly watched and slowly closes the inner door, not only to the diary but to conversation as well. Secret reading may calm a parent for one evening; it can cost a whole year of talking.

⑧ To be fair, the responsibility is not only on parents. Children, too, should be willing to share some parts of their inner life: their worries, big changes, new friends, difficult choices. A diary should never become a secret fortress that keeps all of life away from parents. A healthy family is one where some things are private but many things are shared.

⑨ So where is the line? I would suggest three simple rules. One, parents should ask before reading, and accept a "no" unless there is a clear danger. Two, children should speak up regularly — not every sentence of the diary, but the main storms and joys. Three, both sides should agree that a closed book is not an enemy; it is a small garden where a young person is quietly growing up. With these rules, a diary does not divide a family — it becomes a gentle training ground for respect, trust and honest talk.

根据文章内容，选择最佳答案。

1. What is the writer's main opinion about parents reading their children's diaries?

A. Parents should always freely read any diary without asking.
B. Parents should never read a diary, in any situation.
C. Parents should not read without serious reason and without asking first.
D. Children should not be allowed to keep a diary at all.

2. According to paragraph 2, why is a diary not simply an ordinary notebook?

A. Because it is more expensive than other notebooks.
B. Because it is a private place where young people try to understand themselves honestly.
C. Because it contains only correct school homework.
D. Because teachers check it every week.

3. Which of the following would the writer most likely accept as a reasonable time for a parent to read a diary?

A. When the parent is simply curious about daily school news.
B. When the parent wants to know about a small argument with a friend.
C. When there are clear signs of serious sadness or danger, and after telling the child.
D. Anytime, because children have no right to privacy.

4. According to paragraph 7, what long-term price may parents pay if they read diaries secretly?

A. The children will read their parents' diaries in return.
B. The children will buy more diaries.
C. The children may slowly close their inner door, leading to a whole year of lost talking.
D. The parents will forget the words they read.

5. Which of the following is NOT one of the writer's "three simple rules"?

A. Parents should ask before reading and accept "no" unless there is clear danger.
B. Children should speak up regularly about main storms and joys.
C. Both sides should respect a closed diary as a small garden of growth.
D. Parents should forbid their children to keep any locked book at home.

答案与解析

1.
【答案】C
【题型】主旨大意题
【定位】第①段 "no, not without serious reason and not without asking"
【解析】作者并非一概禁止，而是强调"非严重情况不读且须事先沟通"。A、B、D 均极端。故选 C。

2.
【答案】B
【题型】细节理解题
【定位】第②段 "a private, honest place where a young person tries to understand himself or herself"
【解析】日记是私密、诚实的自我探索空间。A、C、D 均偏题。故选 B。

3.
【答案】C
【题型】细节理解题
【定位】第⑤段 "under clear signs of danger, a parent may read the diary — after first telling the child"
【解析】作者仅在明显危险且提前告知的情形下认可阅读。A、B、D 均不符合作者立场。故选 C。

4.
【答案】C
【题型】细节理解题
【定位】第⑦段 "the child ... slowly closes the inner door ... can cost a whole year of talking"
【解析】偷看可能让孩子关闭心门，带来长期的交流损失。A、B、D 均无依据。故选 C。

5.
【答案】D
【题型】细节判断题（否定型）
【定位】第⑨段三条建议
【解析】作者从未主张禁止孩子保留日记，反而认可其为"私人花园"。A、B、C 均为三条建议。故选 D。
