阅读理解（议论文） Should Middle-School Students Be Allowed to Give Feedback on Their Teachers' Lessons?

① In many universities around the world, it is perfectly normal for students to fill in a feedback form at the end of every term and quietly score their teachers on things like clarity, fairness and classroom atmosphere. In Chinese middle schools, however, this idea is still unusual. Most 13-year-olds never formally tell their teacher what is working in class and what is not. But in 2027, a small number of Chinese schools have begun an experiment: a student feedback form, filled in twice a term, to help teachers improve. This raises a sharp question: should middle-school students be allowed to give feedback on their teachers' lessons?

② Those in favour answer "yes" for three clear reasons. First, nobody knows the classroom better than the students. A teacher sees the lesson from the front; students see it from the chairs. A student can tell you whether the board is hard to read from the back row, whether the teacher speaks too fast in English, whether a worked example was skipped too quickly. These are real details that the teacher, alone at the front, may never notice. Thoughtful student feedback is, in this sense, a kind of free lesson planning for the teacher.

④ Third, a feedback system can rebuild trust. Students often feel that school decisions are made "to them" rather than "with them". When a school invites students to speak honestly — and then, more importantly, acts on some of the useful points — the relationship between classroom and office changes. Students feel seen; teachers feel supported; the school culture becomes more open.

⑤ However, opponents raise real worries. First, teenagers can be unfair. A strict teacher who gives hard homework may be more useful than a popular teacher who tells jokes; but a quick feedback form may reward the fun teacher and punish the strict one. Second, feedback can be misused. In some countries, student evaluations have been shown to contain biases against female teachers, older teachers, and teachers from minority backgrounds. If a Chinese school copies the system without care, the same thing could happen here. Third, feedback may hurt relationships. A shy Grade-7 student who secretly gave a low score may feel strangely guilty every time she sees her teacher in the hallway afterwards. Is that cost too high?

⑥ There is also a privacy worry. If students sign their names on the forms, some will hide their real opinions, afraid of small revenge. If forms are fully anonymous, some students may write cruel or silly things under the cover of secrecy. A feedback system must solve both problems at once, which is not easy.

⑨ In the end, letting middle-school students give feedback on their teachers is not about giving power over adults. It is about learning to speak clearly, listen humbly, and share the work of making a classroom better. A school that teaches students this — gently, carefully, and with fair rules — is not weaker; it is quietly stronger. And the students leaving that school may just carry this habit into their future offices, families and communities, where people of every age must learn to say, politely and usefully, "Here is what I see, and here is what I suggest."

C. Whether middle schools should cancel exams.
D. Whether teachers should grade each other.

2. According to Paragraph 2, why do supporters say students should give feedback?

A. Because students can punish teachers they dislike.
B. Because nobody knows the classroom better than the students themselves, who notice things like board visibility, speaking speed, or unclear steps — thoughtful feedback is "a kind of free lesson planning for the teacher".
C. Because students want higher marks.
D. Because teachers want less work.

3. Which concern is NOT mentioned by the opponents (Paragraphs 5—6)?

A. Teenagers can be unfair and may reward fun teachers over strict but useful ones.
B. Feedback can contain biases against female, older, or minority teachers if copied without care.
C. A feedback system may hurt relationships and raise difficult privacy issues — signed forms may silence honest opinions; anonymous forms may cover cruelty.
D. Feedback will force students to repeat all their homework.

4. What does the writer suggest in Paragraph 7 as a sensible design?

A. Use the feedback alone to decide a teacher's job or bonus.
B. Use signed forms where every student writes their full name and ID.
C. Use anonymous forms, each of which must include at least one concrete example and one suggestion; provide a short class on how to give fair specific feedback; never use the forms alone to judge a teacher; deliver the summary privately.
D. Ban feedback altogether.

5. What is the main message of the last paragraph?

A. Letting students give feedback is not about power over adults, but about learning to speak clearly, listen humbly, and share the work of making a classroom better; a school that teaches this is quietly stronger.
B. Students should run the school completely on their own.
C. Teachers should stop teaching and only listen to students.
D. Feedback will always be unfair.
