阅读理解（记叙文） The National Day Morning I Went to Work with Dad

① On the second morning of the 2027 National Day holiday, my father woke me at six. I turned over and pulled the quilt over my ears. "It's a holiday, Dad," I complained. He only smiled and said, "Today you are coming to the bridge with me." My father is a bridge-painter on the new river-crossing in our city. I had never been to his workplace before, and something in his quiet voice told me I should go.

② The bus took us through empty streets. Red flags hung from every lamp post. When we got off, the sky was still grey, but the river was already awake — wide, silver, and very cold. My father's team of six men stood under the huge steel bridge, drinking hot water from a big thermos. They greeted me kindly. "So you are Old Wang's boy," one uncle said, passing me a small paper cup. "Your dad talks about you every lunch break."

③ Then the work began. They were not painting that day; they were checking the bridge before the holiday traffic grew heavier. My father clipped a bright orange safety belt around his waist, climbed a narrow ladder, and disappeared under the bridge. I waited above with his tool bag. For almost three hours he tapped, listened, measured, wrote notes. Every small sound — a loose bolt, a thin crack — had to be written down. Below him, the river moved; above him, cars began to cross, thump-thump, thump-thump.

④ At ten o'clock he climbed up. His hands were black, his face was red from the wind, and there was a small line of dried paint on his cheek. "How was it?" I asked. "All good," he said, "safe for the holiday." Then he gave me his thermos cup — the last warm water inside — and I suddenly understood: the flag-filled city, the happy families walking to parks, the high-speed trains carrying students home — all of it stood quietly on shoulders like his.

⑤ On the bus back, I did something I had not done for years: I leaned my head against my father's shoulder. He smelt of wind and metal and cold river. He did not speak, but I felt his arm move a little, as if to make more room for me.
