阅读理解（记叙文） The Last Saturday at Grandpa's Watch Shop

① For thirty-one years, my grandpa ran a tiny watch-repair shop at the corner of Xinhua Street. The shop was only six square metres. A single wooden chair stood behind the counter, and a yellow lamp hung low so that its light fell right on the small tools. My mother said the lamp had never moved, not even when I was born.

② Last Saturday was the last day the shop would open. The building was going to be pulled down, and the corner would become part of a new metro station. Mum called me after breakfast. "Xiao Yu, go and help Grandpa pack. He may not say it, but he needs company."

③ When I arrived, the street was already half-gone. Two shops on the left had closed. Grandpa's blue sign still hung above the door — "时光修理铺 · Time Repair Shop" — the English part added by my cousin who studies at university. Grandpa was sitting on his wooden chair, cleaning a small silver watch with a soft brush. He did not look up. "Sit down," he said. "There is still work today."

④ A thin woman came in with a child's plastic watch. "My son cried all morning," she said. "The hand won't move." Grandpa nodded, took a tiny screwdriver, and opened the back. In two minutes the hand was ticking again. He refused her money. "Today is a free day," he said. The woman's eyes grew red. She held the watch with both hands and left without speaking.

⑥ At five o'clock, the sun turned the street orange. Grandpa took out a small box and opened it in front of me. Inside was a watch I had never seen — simple, silver, with blue hands. "This was my father's," he said. "He gave it to me the day I opened this shop. Now you are fifteen. It is yours." I tried to say something but my voice would not come.

⑦ We closed the door together. Grandpa locked it twice. Then he slowly took down the yellow lamp, wrapped it in an old newspaper, and put it in my backpack. "A lamp for small, careful work," he said. "Wherever you study, let the light be low and steady. That is enough."

⑧ Walking home, I kept touching the watch in my pocket and the lamp on my back. The shop was gone, but time had not stopped — it had only moved into my own hands.
