阅读理解（议论文） Is Keeping a Daily Diary Still Worth It for Middle-School Students?

① Every year, around this time, our school hands out thin blue notebooks and asks each student to keep a daily diary for the whole term. Some of us cheer; most of us sigh. In the age of short videos and quick messages, many people ask: is spending ten minutes a day on a paper diary really worth the time? I think the honest answer is yes — but only when the diary is kept in a wise way.

② First, a diary is a slow mirror. Short videos show us only one bright second; a diary records the full hour around that second — how we got there, how we felt before, and what we thought afterwards. Over a year, reading back through the pages, we begin to see our own patterns: which days we are brave, which days we are lazy, which friendships grow stronger, which habits quietly drag us down. No app can give a student this kind of self-portrait.

④ Of course, critics are not wrong. They warn that a forced diary can turn into a tired habit: students copy last week's entry, invent a fake "good deed" to please the teacher, or simply write "today was normal, nothing special" for sixty days in a row. They also worry about privacy: a diary should hold honest feelings, but if the teacher will read it for marks, students may never write what they really think. A diary like that is not a mirror; it is a mask.

⑤ These worries are real, but they speak against a certain kind of diary, not against the habit itself. A better plan is a half-open, half-private diary. Each student keeps two notebooks side by side. The open notebook is for what you are happy to share: a book you liked, a walk after dinner, a question about class. The private notebook, locked with a simple key, is for what only you need to know. Teachers mark the open book for completion, not for content, and never read the private one.

⑥ Some people also ask, "Can't I just keep a digital diary on my phone?" You can, and many adults do. But for teenagers, pen and paper still have a special gift: they slow us down. Typing is fast; handwriting is thoughtful. While your hand moves slowly across the page, your mind has time to catch up, and true feelings — which are often quiet — finally have space to speak.

⑦ Ten minutes a night is not much. Over three years of middle school, it adds up to about 180 hours — roughly one average summer holiday. Spent on videos, those hours disappear without a trace. Spent on a diary, they turn into a small library about the person you are becoming. That library may not win any prize, but one day, perhaps after your own child is born, you will open it and find yourself at thirteen, still waiting on the page.

C. It helps students become more popular online.
D. It can be read by teachers every day.

2. In Paragraph ③, what does the writer compare a diary to?

A. A noisy classroom.
B. A quiet writing coach that trains students to turn ordinary life into sentences.
C. A homework machine.
D. A book of rules.

3. What problem do critics of daily diaries worry about, according to Paragraph ④?

A. Diaries may be too expensive.
B. Students may turn diary-writing into a tired, fake habit, or feel unable to write honestly because the teacher will read it.
C. Diaries take too much money to print.
D. Students will forget English words.

4. What solution does the writer suggest in Paragraph ⑤?

A. Ban diaries completely.
B. Let the teacher read everything for a mark.
C. Use a "half-open, half-private" system: an open notebook marked only for completion, and a private notebook never read by teachers.
D. Write only on phones.

5. What is the writer's main opinion about keeping a diary?

A. Diaries are a waste of time in the age of short videos.
B. Diaries only help professional writers.
C. Keeping a wise diary (honest, partly private, written by hand) is worth the time and becomes a small library of the person a student is becoming.
D. Diaries should be as short as possible.
