阅读理解（议论文） Should Middle-School Students Have a Fixed Monthly Pocket Money?

① My classmate Xiaoman receives exactly 100 yuan every month from her parents. Another classmate, Wenbo, has no fixed money at all: he simply asks when he needs something. A third friend, Yumeng, gets 50 yuan a week only if her room stays tidy. Three different habits, three different families. Which way is best? After listening to parents, teachers and my own grandfather, I believe the answer is clear: a fixed, modest monthly pocket money — tied to no strict performance test — is the healthiest choice for most middle-school students.

② The first reason is learning to manage money. Money, like reading, is a skill: the earlier we try it on our own, the better. A fixed amount teaches three useful habits in one small package. First, budgeting — if your 100 yuan this month is gone on the 20th, you will eat a lot of home porridge before the 1st. Second, waiting — if a new pen costs 60 yuan and you only have 40, you learn to delay joy, one of the most important skills of adult life. Third, thinking in limits — every pocket, every bank card, every salary in the world has a border. Practising inside a small border today keeps us calm inside a larger one tomorrow.

④ The third reason is the rest of our family's money. A fixed amount gives parents peace, too. They know, month after month, how much the child side of the family will spend. There are no surprise 80-yuan afternoons, no long evening arguments over a single coin. With a simple plan, both sides can stop guessing and start trusting.

⑤ Of course, worried voices exist. Some teachers say that children spend wildly if they hold their own money; others point out that rich pocket money creates unfair pressure among classmates, as "he has 300 a month, she only has 50". Both worries are real. The answer, however, is not to stop the idea, but to shape it. Parents can start small — 30 yuan a month in Grade 7 — and slowly raise the amount in Grade 8 and Grade 9.

Schools can, at the form-teacher's meeting, gently suggest a recommended range (for example, 30—120 yuan a month) so that families stay in a healthy neighbourhood.

⑥ A special word about "money for marks": a payment that only comes after a 95-point test paper. I strongly disagree with this. Tying pocket money to a mark turns learning into a business. The student who already scores 100 is paid twice (once by the joy of knowing, once by cash); the student who struggles is punished both by the mark and by empty pockets. A family is not a marketplace. Pocket money should come as a trust, not a reward for something that is already its own reward.

⑦ Some also ask: "Why not pay children for housework?" A light form of this may be fine — for example, a small bonus if a student builds a new habit, such as washing all the family shoes every Saturday for three months. But daily helping — setting the table, wiping the floor — should stay free. We live together, so we clean together. Turning every duty into a price tag makes a kitchen feel like a restaurant.

⑧ One hundred yuan a month does not make a rich child, and no pocket money at all does not make a poor one. But a fixed, modest sum — quiet, reliable, not tied to tests — gives a middle-school student three gifts at once: money skills, dignity, and trust. Three small keys that, many years from now, will quietly open larger doors.

根据短文内容，选择最佳答案。

1. What is the writer's main opinion?

A. Students should get no pocket money.
B. A fixed, modest monthly pocket money (not tied to marks) is the healthiest choice for most middle-school students.
C. Students should decide their own salary from their parents.
D. Pocket money should change every week.

2. In Paragraph ②, which of the following is NOT one of the three skills a fixed pocket money teaches?

A. Budgeting.
B. Waiting and delaying joy.
C. Thinking inside a limit.
D. Always asking parents for help before buying anything.

3. Why does the writer think "dignity and privacy" are important in Paragraph ③?

A. Because students like to keep secrets.
B. Because a student who must ask for every yuan feels like a young beggar in her own home, while one with a small fixed amount can quietly handle normal needs.
C. Because parents don't care about their children.
D. Because money is more important than family.

4. Why does the writer disagree with "money for marks"?

A. Because it makes learning too easy.
B. Because it turns learning into a business; students who already do well are paid twice, while struggling students are punished both by low marks and by empty pockets.
C. Because 95 points is too high a standard.
D. Because money is not interesting to students.

5. What does the writer say about paying for housework in Paragraph ⑦?

A. All housework should be paid.
B. Daily helping (setting the table, wiping the floor) should stay free, because we live together so we clean together; but a light bonus for a new long-term habit may be fine.
C. Students should refuse to do housework without pay.
D. Only parents should clean.
