11-05 第1篇

阅读理解（议论文） Should Our School Make a Real 25-Minute Noon Nap?

① If you walk into our school at 12:50 on any winter weekday, you will see a strange scene: half the classroom is already asleep on the desk, the other half is whispering, two students are finishing lunch, and one brave boy is still doing homework. At 13:00 the bell rings, and everyone must stand up and go to the first afternoon class. Most of us feel worse than before lunch. Some yawn through geography; some cannot remember the first Chinese poem; one of my friends fell asleep during a listening task last week. The question is simple: should our school build in a real, quiet 25-minute noon nap, between 12:40 and 13:05? I believe the answer is yes — and the reasons are stronger than many teachers may think.

② The first reason is health. Doctors at the Beijing Children's Hospital and the Fudan University Medical School have long repeated the same finding: middle-school students who take a short noon nap — about 20 to 30 minutes — show clearly better afternoon focus, steadier heart rates, and lower feelings of "heavy-eye" headache by 16:00. A nap longer than 40 minutes, interestingly, is not better; the brain enters deep sleep and wakes up groggy. Twenty-five minutes is, as one doctor said, the "golden coin" of the school afternoon.

③ The second reason is learning. Science has shown that the 90 minutes right after lunch are the sleepiest hours of the whole school day. This is not because of big lunches; it is a natural dip in our body's internal clock, present in almost every human. Asking students to think sharply about a difficult maths problem at 13:05, without any rest, is asking the brain to run a steep hill in tight shoes. After a short nap, the afternoon lessons feel half a stair easier. Teachers in Shanghai and Chengdu have reported that since their schools introduced a real nap in 2023, afternoon quiz scores in languages and sciences have risen by about 4% to 7%.

④ The third reason is kindness to the quiet students. In every class there are a few students who, at home, sleep less than their peers — a younger sibling crying at night, a parent working late, a noisy street. Without a school nap, they silently pay a double price: less sleep at night, and less rest at noon. A short, respected nap is one of the few quiet gifts that the school can give, equally, to every student, regardless of family conditions.

⑤ Of course, some voices worry. "What if students cannot fall asleep?" "What if a 25-minute nap eats into class time?" "What if some students use the time to chat?" These concerns deserve a real answer, not a polite smile. Yes, some students will not actually sleep. But lying quietly in a dim room with the eyes closed still gives the brain about 60% of the rest of a true nap. And yes, 25 minutes does reduce class time slightly — about 100 minutes a week. Schools in Guangzhou have solved this by shortening the first morning break from 15 to 10 minutes, and by moving some class-meeting time to Friday's double P.E. The arithmetic works out.

⑥ The chat-worry, however, is the most serious, and it has a simple answer: rules and rhythm. Lights off. Curtains half-closed. One quiet teacher at the back desk. No phones. No homework out. Small, cheap eye masks available for those who want them. A soft, pre-recorded piece of music — a gentle erhu or rain sound — playing for the first three minutes, then silence. Many Chinese primary schools have used this system for decades; it works. Middle-schoolers, given a calm environment, are not louder than six-year-olds; they are simply older.

⑦ Some may ask: "Can't students just put their heads on the desk for ten minutes?" The honest answer is: not very well. Desk-sleeping blocks blood flow in the arms, wakes the neck in pain, and often dries the mouth against the wooden edge. Over years, many students have reported shoulder problems from daily desk naps. A small folded blanket, or even a clean cloth pad on the desk, is much better; a simple reclining chair, used in some new schools, is best of all. A policy can be gentle without being sloppy.

⑧ A school day is a long race, and the noon nap is the single most human quiet minute in it. To skip it, in the name of "more class time", is like refusing to drink water during a marathon because "water takes time". Twenty-five minutes of quiet rest does not steal from learning; it serves learning. I hope, by next spring, the P.E. clock in every Lihua classroom shows a real noon nap — 12:40 to 13:05, lights low, voices off, eyes closed. A short rest, taken kindly, is not a break from school. It is a part of it.

注释： nap 午睡；focus 专注；groggy 迷糊的；internal clock 生物钟；eye mask 眼罩；reclining chair 躺椅

根据短文内容，选择最佳答案。

1. What is the writer's main proposal?

A. Students should sleep all afternoon.
B. The school should build in a real, quiet 25-minute noon nap between 12:40 and 13:05.
C. Only Grade 9 students should nap.
D. Students should not eat lunch.

2. According to Paragraph ②, why should the noon nap NOT be longer than 40 minutes?

A. Because students will get too hungry.
B. Because the brain enters deep sleep and wakes up groggy; 25 minutes is the "golden coin" of the school afternoon.

C. Because classes finish earlier.
D. Because 40 minutes is against school rules.

3. Why is the writer's third reason described as "kindness to the quiet students"?

A. Because some students like being quiet.
B. Because some students sleep less at home (due to a crying sibling, a late-working parent, or a noisy street); a school nap is a quiet gift shared equally by all students, regardless of family conditions.
C. Because quiet students get higher marks.
D. Because quiet students help teachers.

4. Which TWO things have some schools in Guangzhou used to solve the "class time" problem?

A. Shortening the first morning break from 15 to 10 minutes, and moving some class-meeting time to Friday's double P.E.
B. Cutting lunch in half, and stopping P.E.
C. Starting school at 05:00, and ending at 22:00.
D. Giving up all tests.

5. What does the writer mean by saying "a short rest, taken kindly, is not a break from school. It is a part of it"?

A. Rest and study are separate things.
B. Learning is hurt by any rest.
C. A carefully-run 25-minute nap is not time stolen from class; it is a real, necessary part of the school day that serves learning itself.
D. Students should decide when to rest.

答案与解析

1.
【答案】B
【题型】主旨大意题
【定位】第①段末 "between 12:40 and 13:05"
【解析】立论直引。A、C、D 均偏。故选 B。

2.
【答案】B
【题型】细节理解题
【定位】第②段 "A nap longer than 40 minutes ... groggy ... 'golden coin'"
【解析】时长科学原理。A、C、D 均错。故选 B。

3.
【答案】B
【题型】细节理解题
【定位】第④段 "sleep less than their peers ... double price ... regardless of family conditions"
【解析】平等保护直引。A、C、D 均错。故选 B。

4.
【答案】A
【题型】细节理解题
【定位】第⑤段 "shortening the first morning break from 15 to 10 minutes ... moving some class-meeting time to Friday's double P.E."
【解析】时间置换双方案。B、C、D 均错或不合理。故选 A。

5.
【答案】C
【题型】主旨大意题
【定位】第⑧段结尾 "serves learning ... a part of it"
【解析】休息与学习一体。A、B、D 均偏。故选 C。