阅读理解（议论文） Should Our School Try One "No-Homework Weekend" a Month?

① At the class meeting last Friday our form teacher asked a small but loud question: "If our school could give you, just once a month, a weekend with no written homework, would you want it?" The classroom went very still for a second — then exploded into a warm, careful discussion. Some people worried: "Will we fall behind?" Some people laughed with relief. After two long evenings of thinking, I have quietly settled on one opinion: our school should try one 'no-homework weekend' a month, for at least one whole term. I do not say this to be popular; I say it because it is honest, and the small risks are worth the big gains.

④ The third reason is that one gap teaches the other six weekends. When a student works without any break, he often does not know whether his weekend homework is too much, too little, or just right. After one "empty" weekend, he sees the contrast clearly. A student told me last week, "I noticed that last Saturday I finished an essay in 50 minutes. Normally I drift on my phone for two hours first. The no-homework weekend showed me what my own essay speed really is." That kind of self-knowledge is hard to buy and harder to teach. One monthly gap is a small laboratory in which each student can study his own habits.

conversation at home. If the school officially writes, "Please, on this weekend, no homework and, where possible, no cram class," most parents will respect this. A 2025 poll in our city found that 71% of parents said they would follow a clear school "rest rule," even if their first instinct was to add more lessons. The school's voice, clear and kind, is often the anchor a family did not know it needed.

⑥ Others argue, "Weak students will fall behind more." I understand this worry — it is the most serious of all. But the plan is for the whole class, not the top students only. Teachers, with the no-homework weekend as a clear rest, can shift one evening of the following week to a short, warm "catch-up corner" — 40 minutes after school, voluntary, for any student who needs a quiet place to finish a small piece. The weekend is not stolen from weak students; it is paired with a careful mid-week corner that is often kinder than weekend homework ever was.

⑨ This Monday the class representatives will put a short letter into the headmaster's postbox — 300 words, signed by every student who agrees, asking for a three-month trial. We are not asking for a day off; we are asking for one careful, planned, measured gap in our year. A school that knows how to plan rest will be trusted by its students more, not less. A good school does not only teach us how to work; it also, quietly and seriously, teaches us how to stop, and how to come back. Stop. Come back. Begin again, with a clearer head. That is the real lesson we are asking for this Monday morning.

根据短文内容，选择最佳答案。

1. What is the writer's main proposal?

A. Students should take the whole month off.
B. The school should try one "no-homework weekend" a month, for at least one whole term.
C. Homework should be forbidden.
D. Teachers should work less.

2. Why does the writer say "a rested weekend is not an empty weekend"?

A. Because students must stay in school all weekend.
B. Because a no-homework weekend is paired with three gentle invitations, not rules — one meal helped by the student, one walk of at least 3 km with a family member or friend, and one hour of reading something not in the school timetable; even if only one of the three happens, the weekend is already healthier than a normal one.
C. Because students will go to cram class for sure.
D. Because empty weekends are dangerous.

3. How does the writer answer the worry that "parents will still send us to extra classes"?

A. Parents are always wrong.
B. A school-wide rule can quietly change the conversation at home; a 2025 city poll showed that 71% of parents would follow a clear school "rest rule" even if their first instinct was to add more lessons — the school's clear, kind voice is often the anchor families did not know they needed.
C. Cram classes are illegal.
D. Parents must pay higher fees.

4. How does the writer answer the worry that "weak students will fall behind more"?

A. By saying the plan is only for the top students.
B. By saying the plan is for the whole class, and teachers can shift one evening of the following week to a short, warm "catch-up corner" — 40 minutes after school, voluntary, for any student who needs a quiet place to finish a small piece; the weekend is paired with a careful mid-week corner.
C. By saying weak students should quit.
D. By saying homework does not matter.

5. What does the writer mean by "a good school does not only teach us how to work; it also, quietly and seriously, teaches us how to stop, and how to come back"?

A. Students should never work hard.
B. A school's real job includes teaching students to rest and restart with a clearer head, not only to keep going; that planned stop is itself a form of education the writer is asking for.

C. Schools should be closed every weekend.
D. Working is less important than playing.
