12-26 第1篇

阅读理解（记叙文） The First Time I Took Care of Grandpa Alone During His 38.9-°C Fever

① On Sunday 26 December 2027, at exactly 14:20 in the afternoon, I became, for the first time in my thirteen years, the only person in the small flat taking care of Grandpa. Mum had been called away to the hospital at 11:40 because Auntie Lin had slipped on the icy steps of Shengli Road and broken a thin bone in her left wrist; Dad was driving a work delivery on the ring road and could not return until 19:30 at the earliest. Grandpa, who is 74 and who normally walks one gentle kilometre every morning, had come home from his Saturday walk shaking a little, and by Sunday noon his forehead had been hot under my palm. When Mum left, she had told me, quickly, at the door, "Yiran, thermometer is in the bathroom drawer, warm water every hour, do not give any medicine without phoning me, call me at 13 minutes past any hour — that is when I will be free for 3 minutes." Then the door closed, and the flat became very quiet.

② I wrote down what Mum had said on the back of a maths-test paper, with the small gold pen Granny gave me. Thermometer · warm water · no medicine alone · :13 call. Then I went into Grandpa's room. He was lying on the wooden bed under the old blue quilt, his eyes half-closed, his forehead shining with a thin layer of sweat. I put my palm on his forehead, and I could feel — even without the thermometer — that it was hotter than my own forehead, which was quite cold from the winter air outside. My hands began to tremble a little, but I remembered something Ms Qin said once in a class: "When a small person is afraid, the first thing to do is the smallest possible useful thing." I walked to the bathroom and picked up the thermometer. The smallest possible useful thing, I decided, was to know the real number.

③ At 14:28, I shook the old mercury thermometer carefully down below 35°C (Grandpa had taught me this three years ago, before I was even brave enough to hold it), placed it under his armpit, and waited a full ten minutes with my phone open to the stopwatch. I did not speak. Grandpa did not speak. Outside the window, a single winter sparrow hopped on the gingko branch. When the ten minutes were over, I took the thermometer out and walked — not ran — to the lamp. The thin silver line had stopped at 38.9°C. Not a small fever. Not a huge fever. A middle fever, as Mum would say. I sat down on the small footstool beside the bed and closed my eyes for five long seconds. Then, because it was 14:38 and not 14:13, I did the next smallest possible useful thing: I boiled water.

④ While the water was cooling to drinking temperature, I did the things I had watched Mum do a hundred times without ever really seeing them: I placed a cool — not cold —

damp towel, folded into four, on Grandpa's forehead; I opened the bedroom window for exactly three minutes to let in the dry cold air, then closed it again; I brought a small enamel basin of luke-warm water and, with a clean face towel, gently wiped Grandpa's hands from wrist to fingertips, and then his feet from ankle to toes. Grandpa opened his eyes halfway and said, in his thin voice, "Yiran… this is warmer than I expected." Then he closed his eyes again. I almost cried, but I remembered the second useful thing Ms Qin had said: "If you cry now, you cannot see the thermometer later. Cry tonight, after Grandpa is sleeping."

⑤ At exactly 15:13, I phoned Mum. She picked up on the second ring. I said, in a very steady voice that surprised me, "Grandpa 38.9°C at 14:38. Cool towel on. Feet wiped. Three minutes window. Warm water drunk 80 ml. No medicine. He spoke one sentence — he said the water was warmer than he expected." There was a tiny pause on Mum's side, and then she said, "Yiran, you did everything right. Do not give any pill. If it goes above 39.0°C, phone me immediately, not at :13. If it stays between 38.5 and 39.0 for two hours, I will come home at 17:40." I said yes, and I wrote on the maths-test paper: Upper alarm 39.0°C. Mum back 17:40 if steady.

⑥ Between 15:13 and 17:38, I took Grandpa's temperature four more times — 38.8, 38.6, 38.5, 38.4 — dropping very slowly but steadily. I gave him 80 ml of warm water at the top of each hour. I changed the forehead towel three times. I wiped his hands and feet twice more. At 16:40, he asked for a small piece of plain cold rice porridge Mum had left on the stove, and he ate seven small spoons of it. At 17:02, he fell asleep properly for the first time all afternoon, and his breathing became softer, and a tiny bit slower. I sat on the small footstool and did not move. I did not read. I did not touch my phone. I just watched the quilt rise and fall. For thirty-eight minutes, I was the quietest thirteen-year-old girl in the whole city of ours.

⑦ At 17:40, the door opened. Mum came in, still smelling faintly of the hospital's white soap. She walked straight to the bed, felt Grandpa's forehead, picked up the thermometer log I had written, and read my numbers in silence. Then she turned to me, put one hand on my shoulder, and said softly, "Yiran. You looked after your grandfather well today. You used your brain, your hands, and your breathing, all at once. I am, this afternoon, more grateful to you than I can say." I did not speak. I just walked into my little bedroom, closed the door quietly, and cried for about four minutes, just as Ms Qin had said — only after Grandpa was safely asleep. When I came back out, Mum had already started a small pan of light ginger soup on the stove. She did not ask why my eyes were red. She simply handed me a bowl of the soup and said, "Drink slowly. Tomorrow Grandpa will be much better. And tonight, we will both sleep a little earlier." That night at 21:40, as I lay in bed, I understood, for the first real time in my life, a small quiet sentence: to love a family member is, sometimes, to stay very calm and do the next smallest possible useful thing, one after another, for three hours and twenty minutes, without making any noise.

注释： fever 发烧；thermometer 体温计；mercury 水银；armpit 腋下；porridge 粥；ring road 环路

根据短文内容，选择最佳答案。

1. Why did the narrator become, for the first time, the only person looking after Grandpa on Sunday afternoon 26 December 2027?

A. Because Mum had been called away at 11:40 to the hospital after Auntie Lin slipped on the icy steps of Shengli Road and broke a thin bone in her left wrist, and Dad was driving a work delivery on the ring road and could not return until 19:30 at the earliest; Grandpa, 74, who normally walks one gentle kilometre every morning, had come home shaking a little the previous day and by Sunday noon his forehead was hot under the narrator's palm, so before leaving Mum quickly instructed: thermometer in the bathroom drawer, warm water every hour, no medicine without phoning her, call her at :13 past any hour when she would be free for 3 minutes.
B. Because the narrator chose to stay home alone with Grandpa for fun.
C. Because Grandpa asked everyone to leave so he could have a quiet afternoon.
D. Because the family was away at a New Year holiday resort.

2. What was the result of the first careful temperature measurement and how did the narrator respond?

A. The narrator found the temperature to be completely normal and did nothing.
B. At 14:28 the narrator shook the old mercury thermometer carefully down below 35°C (as Grandpa had taught her three years earlier), placed it under his armpit, waited a full ten minutes with the phone stopwatch open, and read 38.9°C — not small, not huge, a middle fever as Mum would say; the narrator sat on the small footstool for five long seconds and, because it was 14:38 not 14:13, did the next smallest possible useful thing — boiled water.
C. The narrator rushed to the pharmacy alone to buy strong medicine.
D. The narrator gave Grandpa two fever pills without asking anyone.

3. What specific nursing actions did the narrator take while waiting for Mum?

A. The narrator left Grandpa alone and watched a film in the living room.
B. The narrator did the things she had watched Mum do a hundred times without really seeing them: placed a cool — not cold — damp towel folded into four on Grandpa's forehead; opened the bedroom window for exactly three minutes to let in the dry cold air then closed it; brought a small enamel basin of luke-warm water and gently wiped Grandpa's hands wrist-to-fingertips and feet ankle-to-toes with a clean face towel; Grandpa opened his eyes halfway and said "Yiran… this is warmer than I expected" then closed them again; the narrator almost cried but remembered Ms Qin's words — "if you cry now, you cannot see the thermometer later" — and did not cry.

C. The narrator only stood in the kitchen and waited for several hours without action.
D. The narrator carried Grandpa to the bathroom and gave him a cold shower.

4. What did the narrator's report to Mum at 15:13 contain, and what instructions did Mum give back?

A. The narrator phoned Mum crying and could not form a clear sentence.
B. At exactly 15:13 the narrator phoned and in a surprisingly steady voice said, "Grandpa 38.9°C at 14:38. Cool towel on. Feet wiped. Three-minute window. Warm water drunk 80 ml. No medicine. He spoke one sentence — the water was warmer than he expected." Mum paused briefly then instructed: do not give any pill; if it goes above 39.0°C phone immediately, not at :13; if it stays between 38.5 and 39.0 for two hours, Mum would come home at 17:40; the narrator wrote on the maths-test paper: Upper alarm 39.0°C. Mum back 17:40 if steady.
C. Mum told the narrator to panic and run to the neighbours immediately.
D. Mum told the narrator to give Grandpa two adult pills every thirty minutes.

5. What is the main insight the narrator gained by 21:40 that night?

A. That loving a family member means giving loud advice and taking many big actions at once.
B. That it is better to panic and cry loudly during an illness in order to get attention.
C. That to love a family member is, sometimes, to stay very calm and do the next smallest possible useful thing, one after another, for three hours and twenty minutes, without making any noise — a quiet realisation reached only after watching the quilt rise and fall for thirty-eight silent minutes, crying for about four minutes alone after Grandpa was safely asleep, drinking the ginger soup Mum handed her, and lying in bed at 21:40 with her eyes finally closed.
D. That young people should not be allowed near sick elders.

答案与解析

1.
【答案】A
【题型】细节理解题
【定位】第①段
【解析】"林姨手腕 / 爸送货 19:30 / 外公 74 发热 / 每时 :13 电"直引。B、C、D 均错。故选 A。

2.
【答案】B
【题型】细节理解题
【定位】第③段

【解析】"14:28 甩表 10 分钟 38.9°C 中度 / 5 秒 / 最小有用事 = 烧水"直引。A、C、D 均错。故选 B。

3.
【答案】B
【题型】细节理解题
【定位】第④段
【解析】"凉湿巾 / 通风 3 分钟 / 温水擦手足 / 未哭"直引。A、C、D 均错。故选 B。

4.
【答案】B
【题型】细节理解题
【定位】第⑤段
【解析】"15:13 稳定播报 / 39.0°C 即时 / 38.5–39.0 稳定 17:40 回"直引。A、C、D 均错。故选 B。

5.
【答案】C
【题型】主旨大意题
【定位】第⑦段
【解析】"爱=冷静 / 做下一个最小有用事 / 3h20min 不出声"主旨。A、B、D 均偏离。故选 C。